

In response to the driver's education online debate I would like to add something of my own. Thank you for your time and commitment to all people involved.

Written by a concerned citizen in Minnesota that would like to remain anonymous.

I'm driving on the freeway going about 60 miles per hour and I look around in rush hour traffic to see that I'm surrounded by stressed out people.

Everyone seems to be on the cell phone, eating breakfast, doing the things they were suppose to do before they left the house. And then a light bulb went off in my head when I realized this. These are grown adults I'm sharing the road with. These are the people that got there license 20, 30, 40 years ago. No wonder why everyone seems a little out of touch with the road ways. We are supposed to be grown mature adults. The one's that are suppose to model the behavior that we want to instill in our own children.

We sit here and complain about teens behind the wheel, but what about us. I think we all need to take a refresher course in drivers Ed. Let us take back our children and learn to have a dialog with them over extremely important issues such as this. Having an option to take drivers Ed online not only will teach our loved ones how to drive but it will also give us parents the opportunity to get more involved with our kids lives and also relearn the rules of the road again, the same rules that we have been breaking everyday since 1960. Doesn't it seem as though something is pulling our families apart?